

The Brief

Recent years have provided something of a phenomenon in the field of self-promotion, with reality TV, the cult of the celebrity and the huge popularity of websites such as MySpace giving the individual infinite opportunity to communicate with the outside world. Such a cultural atmosphere has led certain observers to declare that we have reached an almost religious level of self-importance, believing nothing to be beyond our powers whilst denouncing previously held values of expertise for being archaic or 'out of touch'. Has the manifestation of such a self-centered culture impacted on issues of world importance such as global warming, globalisation and imperialism, or has it served to liberate and empower the individual?

Crossfields asks contributors to discuss notions of ego in the widest, most creative sense, considering not simply the concept of egotism but the greater aspects such as self and identity. As always, contributors are invited from as broad a background as possible and contributions are encouraged over various platforms, from imagery, through the written word to film.

Submission details

Submissions

Work will be accepted in the following formats:

Graphic/illustration/ photography

Low-res PDFs or JPEGs
(72dpi)

Spread: A3 (3mm bleed)

Single page: A4 (3mm bleed)

—

Written

Microsoft Word/RTF files

—

Motion

QuickTime movies

(compress with MPEG4 codec, 15fps)

—

All successful contributors will be contacted to supply us with hi-resolution files prior to publication.

Contribution deadline

March 31st 2007

Contact

Crossfields

c/o Wire Design

11–29 Fashion Street

London E1 6PX

crossfields@wiredesign.com